

I had an urgency to find Elliot. I noticed their front door was unlocked and let myself in.

I took time to search the rooms of this small house for any clues of the boys whereabouts, stumbling across the following:

- disturbing videos on Cornelius' laptop
- strange drawings and sketches in Corn's diary as well a family album which truly make me shiver.
- A letter addressed to the boys from their mother, I believe this was her final letter to them and revealed intricate details about her final hours.

It was the bathroom that uncovered for me the darkest of scenarios- did Cornelius kill Elliot?

Scribbled on a torn note was this:

*Forever I will be
Locked in this world
Over time I might
Overcome this, but
Right now,
Brother, you have moved
On, I will Always
Remember
Dad.*

Racing into the living room, I saw something odd about area of the floorboards- they were slightly removed from their original position. Lifting them I discovered a very damaged toy, which I immediately recognized as Cornelius' bear. Both eyes had been ripped out.

Cornelius then appeared from behind me, muttering words that I could hardly make out, pacing back and forth and clearly showing signs of distress.

I tried to calm Cornelius down, and sat him on the living room couch, when I began to question him about his brother, the backdoor opened and Elliot came out. He had walked outside to remove himself from any potential escalated violence.

Cornelius' outburst had never before reached this level of intensity and he still remains a risk to Elliot. I've put Cornelius on a higher dosage of Serzone and Clonazepam, which I will review in the next fortnight. Elliot has been advised to remove himself from the house whenever Elliot begins his outbursts and to contact me immediately.
